Kavanaugh defended the company after the same killer whale killed 3 people, (including a mentally troubled fan who had previously broken into my Austin home.) Inherent danger of some hard hitting sports is one thing. A caged predator with a proven killer track record is another.

I may have asked this before, but I can't remember: did the intruder in your house ever explain specifically what he wanted to do once inside? Just... bask in your presence? It didn't seem like he was there to harm you (not that you had any way of knowing that, of course).

He was out of his mind. Claimed he saw a hologram of me as Lord British beaconing to come receive his reward, then that I trapped him inside after he broke in. Babbled about scenes from Ultima & my haunted houses. Then was killed by Tilikum (the original Shamu.)

Jeez. There's crazy and then there's crazy, and then there's seeing kingly holograms. And here I thought I had issues.

It reminds me somewhat of the movie "Mazes & Monsters," which was pretty much responsible for the whole "Satanic panic" myths that haunted Dungeons & Dragons well into the 90s.

Come to think of it, putting a giant flaming pentagram on Ultima 8's box didn't help my case that D&D wasn't Satanic with my mom, you know! =P

That was sort of my point. I was tired of writing games about virtue for more than a decade, and having TV evangelists still call them satanic. Since I am not a believer, and pentagrams are used in books and movies without backlash, I pushed the limits on purpose!

I remember getting Pagan as a Christmas present, pentagram and all, though my parents weren't that religious, either. I think I remember some off comments by religious relatives, though. =P

That was the plan, let the crazies show themselves.
Anyone who thinks role playing games turn your kids into devil worshipers deserves to be called out.
